PARAGRAPHS OF INTEREST.

JULY.

The poets have not sung of this July. As they have sung of favored May and June; Yet with this tropic heat and glowing sky, Which make this day one long perpetual noon.

There comes a strange forgetfulness of care. The weary, overburdened heart to bloom, And to the dreamer it is given to share The pleasures of voluptuous idleness.

Months of burning suns and mellow moons, Which warm the heart as would some rare old wine, Among the generous earth's delightful foods, There is none dearer than these days of June.

Could poet find more fitting theme for rhyme Than rare July, the perfect summer time? "How does he obtain them?" "The great manager furthest of the world is Carl Hagenbeck, of Hamburg. He can provide a menagerie cheaper than you can collect it in any other way. I have generally found it cheaper to get even my great South American serpents from him than to get them in Brazil."

"From his agents. He has a dozen active agents in Asia, Africa, Australia and South America all the while. But even they don't catch the animals. The young wild animals are caught by the natives in different localities. They catch the young ones and bring them out, and sell them whenever the agents come around."

"They showmen seldom catch their own wild animals?" "Oh, never! I have come about as near it as anybody, for I really have an agent, Keeler, who rides on camels in Asia and South America, and says whatever I want that cannot be had cheaper of Hagenbeck."

"How do the natives catch wild animals—tigers, for instance?" "They never catch tigers. Tigers, full grown tigers, are not to be caught. You could as easily catch a hurricane. Let us understand, to begin with, that all ferocious wild animals that are captured at all are captured when they are cubs and quite little. Take a tiger, for instance. When the natives want a tiger and must have one, they go out into the jungle heavily armed, and make off on fast horses. It is a little exciting, even this way, but not quite so exciting as it would be to catch an old tiger or tigers by the tail and get it into a corral. Not quite!"

"Then almost all tigers, panthers, etc., left the jungle when they were babies?" "Just so. Of course full-grown elephants are captured often, and camels are as plenty as corn, and about as cheap, but the men who capture a mature tiger or tigers, or a Brazilian box forty feet long, would have to get up in the morning and be very early."

"Some animals are raised here, I suppose?" "Oh, yes. Camels can be raised here easily. And lions. We now breed our own lions here, and this country raises more lions than it can use—more than we can consume, as the political economists would say; lions breed easily. Tigers are very difficult to raise in captivity. The mothers destroy their young—bite them to death, or jam them with their great jaws. So does the hippopotamus. A young hippopotamus is generally smothered the first day. The period of gestation of an elephant is long, so that the mother rarely keeps still long enough to breed."

"Is that baby elephant in the London circus genuine?" "Indeed it is. I wish it wasn't. I should be tens of thousands of dollars better off. A full grown elephant is worth about $6,000, but I offered the London circus company $100,000 for the
